Do you ever wonder why superheroes in movies disguise themselves when they're out to save the world?

Well, its because they dont want people to worship the face behind those costumes;

they dont do it for popularity or status in society.

They do it because they have a zeal, a passion in them to help someone who needs it.

It's the same for doctors.

Behind that mask is a soul burning to provide light for others who are blinded by darkness.

Those hands suffocating in the white latex are fighting with death for people who are mere strangers.

He sits in the lap of mother earth as his legs crumple under the weight of the hope and the trust of his patients lying on their death beds.
But his bloodshot eyes dont give up, they search their way through millions of obstacles to keep other souls alive.
Those magnificent wings of this guardian angel arent meant for flying, they close around his patients to give them warmth and relief from excruciating pain their bodies suffer.

He is a man of god, who fights with the laws of nature to keep hearts beating.
He sacrifices his family to save the households of others.
For every life that is saved there's joy but the sorrow of each death stabs him in his face and makes him more fragile.
But he has to stand up again and overcome this grief to fight another war all over again.
Not all superheroes wear capes, some wear stethoscopes.
